World Cultural Heritage and Authenticity

In 1994, the Nara Conference on Authenticity in Relation to the World Heritage Convention (hereafter Nara Conference) was held, marking its 30th anniversary this year. The Nara Document on Authenticity, adopted during the conference, continues to significantly influence the field of cultural heritage protection three decades later. However, it has also given rise to various interpretations across different countries. Therefore, it is necessary for World Heritage practice to reconsider the meaning of 'authenticity' as understood in the Nara Document. In response to this, the conference aims to clarify the original intentions and objectives of the creators of the Nara Document, and to provide a platform for participants to share insights on what has been accomplished and what challenges remain.

Authenticity, discussed as the "essential qualifying factor concerning values" in the Nara Document, was intended to serve as a tool for value assessment in World Heritage practices. However, specific guidelines for its implementation remain unclear, hindering the fulfilment of its original purpose.

The first day of the conference aims to clarify the original intentions and objectives of the creators of the Nara Document. The second day will focus on the restoration and reconstruction of National Treasure-class historic sites and buildings during post-disaster recovery. The focus on cultural heritage classified as national treasures lies in the fact that, during the processes of restoration and reconstruction, it becomes evident what each country considers to be the "most important value" of its cultural heritage. This situation enables us to assess value from various perspectives, allowing for a broad discussion about "authenticity."

Through this discussion, we hope to effectively share the extensive knowledge and examples from Japan, a country frequently affected by disasters, while also providing an opportunity to exchange thoughts on the actual situation relating to the "theory" and "practice" in different countries.
